BPS teaching awards

PROFESSOR Mark Griffiths from Nottingham Trent University and Dr Andy Field from the University of Sussex have jointly been awarded the 2005 Award for Distinguished Contributions to the Teaching of Psychology. The award recognises unusually significant contributions to education and training in psychology within the UK.

Dr Field was nominated by Professor Graham Davey for his ability to make statistics interesting, the breadth of support materials he provides and for his contribution to teaching literature, in particular his book Discovering Statistics Using SPSS, which is estimated to have sold around 35,000 copies.

Professor Davey said: ‘Andy has revolutionised the teaching of research methods and statistics. His approach is to stress the important conceptual ideas of statistics, without getting too bogged down in the maths, and most important his lectures are extremely funny.

‘His book is also the only statistics text in which you can learn about complex things like multiple regression and logistic regression while at the same time answering bizarre questions such as “When people attend rock festivals does their smell get worse?”’

Dr Field also has the support of his students; and comments from past and present undergraduates and postgraduates include ‘I have never met anyone as dedicated, agile-minded and able as Dr Field’ and ‘His role-modelling continues to inspire me as a student’.

On completing his first degree in psychology at City University, Dr Field started his DPhil in psychology at the University of Sussex and it was then that his teaching experience began. Since then he has taught aspects of clinical psychology and research methodology and statistics.

After completing his DPhil he became a research fellow and postdoctoral research fellow at the University of Sussex. In 1997 he became a statistician at Princess Royal Hospital before becoming a lecturer at the University of London in 1998. In 2000 he moved back to the University of Sussex as lecturer and in 2001 he was awarded the University of Sussex Teaching, Learning and Development Prize for Excellence and Innovation in Teaching. He took up his current post as senior lecturer in 2003.

Accepting the accolade, Dr Field said: ‘I am extremely honoured to receive this award, especially because it’s for something that I love doing and that is very important to me. Given the many inspirational teachers I frequently encounter I am undoubtedly very fortunate that lecturing two-way repeated measures ANOVA while wearing a Santa Claus beard and hat is considered innovative these days.’

Joint winner Professor Mark Griffiths was nominated by three colleagues who recognise his outstanding performance and contributions across a number of areas, including teaching literature and development of students, but particularly his performance as a classroom teacher.

Lead nominator Jonathan Parke said: ‘Professor Griffiths is a unique individual whose passion for teaching and disseminating his work both orally and in written format can be matched by very few individuals. He also has an ability to inspire and motivate students in a way I have rarely seen… I should know because I was one of those students!’

One student who has been taught by Professor Griffiths in 2004/5 said: ‘Mark is the best lecturer I have ever seen. He can be so funny and so informative at the same time that I would never want to miss one of his lectures.’ While another added: ‘Although apparently very busy, he always makes times to really try and help any students with any of their worries or questions. Mark Griffiths is a spectacular lecturer!’

After graduating with a BSc in psychology from the University of Bradford, Professor Griffiths began teaching in 1987 while doing his PhD at Exeter University. While studying for his doctorate he was as a lecturer for the Worker’s Education Association and did weekly support teaching at Exeter University. In 1990 he got his first full-time lectureship at the University of Plymouth where he also gained his teaching qualifications. In 1995 he moved to Nottingham Trent University, where he has worked ever since and is currently Professor of Gambling Studies.

Accepting the award, Professor Griffiths said: ‘I am absolutely delighted to have won this award. It is an honour to have the work that I do recognised by my peers and by such a prestigious body as the BPS.’

Consultation responses

OCTOBER saw the Society contribute to several important consultations, on topics including the early release of prisoners, assisted dying, the UK’s health research strategy, and age discrimination.

A response to the Department of Health consultation ‘Best research for best health: A new National Health Research Strategy’ was prepared by Professor Stanton Newman (Centre for Behavioural & Social Sciences, UCL), with contributions from Dr Roger Paxton and Dr Myra Cooper. The response welcomed attempts to raise the status of applied patient research, but questioned the focus on medical academics. It called for individual and organisational incentives for non-medical staff to do research, and a proper career for non-medical scientists in universities who conduct research in the NHS. Greater collaboration and coordination with universities was seen as a key issue. The authors also called for a review of the remit and terms of reference of proposed research networks.

Responding to the All Party Parliamentary Group on Compassion in Dying, the Society pointed to ‘problems for medical practitioners, including issues of conscience’ and to the possibility that ‘a change in the law may also lead to negative feelings about the value of life being internalised by vulnerable people e.g. older adults, parents of disabled children or parents who know that they have a “damaged” fetus.’ However, the Society felt that many of the questions in the consultation document did not conform to a ‘yes, no, don’t know’ format because they implied a ‘complex and sensitive decision-making process, which must be decided on a case-by-case basis’. The response also made the point that many of the questions were empirical and that ‘there is currently either too little or no data on which to make informed, evidence-based judgements’.

The Division of Forensic Psychology responded to the Sentencing Commission Scotland consultation ‘Early release from prison and supervision of prisoners on their release’. Although generally supportive of the principle of early release – which allows for the development of appropriate social learning, employment opportunity and social rebuild – the Society acknowledged that the systems currently in place could be improved in terms of credibility and transparency. Indeterminate sentence prisoners should be given clearer guidelines in relation to what is expected of them before they move into the community part of their sentence. The judiciary could consider treatment requirements in their sentencing; in relation to sex offenders, the Society felt that short-term sentences provide little opportunity for rehabilitation.

The Division of Occupational Psychology prepared the Society’s response to the Department of Trade and Industry’s consultation ‘Equality and diversity: Coming of age’, which included draft regulations to outlaw age discrimination in the workplace. The Society agreed that legislation was ‘a necessary first step to help prevent unfair discrimination’ but expressed concern about some of the content of the draft regulations and the practicalities of their implementation. In particular, the proposed cut-off age of 65 was criticised as being too low because research shows that overall there is an insignificant decline in work effectiveness up to age 75. The Society also felt that the proposed exemption for age discrimination in the workplace. The Society agreed that legislation was ‘a necessary first step to help prevent unfair discrimination’ but expressed concern about some of the content of the draft regulations and the practicalities of their implementation. In particular, the proposed cut-off age of 65 was criticised as being too low because research shows that overall there is an insignificant decline in work effectiveness up to age 75. The Society also felt that the proposed exemption for direct discrimination by employers on the grounds of ‘objective justification’ was unclear and would give rise to ambiguities in what practices were or were not permissible.

The Society has bought new premises for its London base. The seven-storey building in Tabernacle Street, EC2, was acquired in October and is expected to be ready for meetings and other activities from April 2006. For the full story see President Graham Powell’s column on p.713.

THE BOARDS

SELECTED NEWS FROM THE BOARDS

Psychology Education Board (29 September 2005)
- Exam results. The board was pleased to note that press coverage of AS- and A-level psychology had been less negative than in previous years, but felt that there were still common misconceptions about psychology that need to be addressed.
- A-level psychology. The board was pleased to note that the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority is conducting a review of A-level psychology criteria, and are open to a radical reassessment of school-level psychology, including formal recognition that it should be classed as a science. The board will be closely involved with future discussions on the matter.

Membership and Professional Training Board (30 September 2005)
- Affiliate and Foreign Affiliate membership categories. The board agreed with the recommendation of the Admissions Committee to make changes to the Statutes and Rules so that the distinction between Affiliate and Foreign Affiliate membership be abolished.
- Web publication of training information. The board agreed to recommend to the Board of Trustees that information on training is published only on the main BPS website and not additionally on Division sites as is currently the practice. Division sites should instead include links to the appropriate parts of the main site.
- Educational psychology training. The board approved a new position statement in relation to educational psychology training for publication on the Society’s website (www.bps.org.uk/tiny/8i4kmw).

ETHICS COLUMN No.4

CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

The Ethics Committee is keen to use this column to react to questions about ethical issues, and it has received a number of helpful suggestions from members for future topics that it is working on. The committee is also working together with the Investigatory Committee and the Professional Conduct Board to feed back advice from cases where a complaint has been investigated.

The committee has recently considered some enquiries about potential conflicts of interest where there is a proposal to see a client for privately funded work where one has previously treated or assessed the client in a publicly funded role, or as an expert witness in proceedings.

The Code of Conduct does not specifically prohibit this, but if such a proposal is being considered the psychologist will need to carefully examine the facts of the case, applying the ethical principles underlying the Code. Any such proposal will need to be approached with caution, and should only be proceeded with if the psychologist can demonstrate an objective belief that it is genuinely in the best interests of the client.

There are several sections of the Code of Conduct that are likely to be relevant in coming to an ethical decision. The psychologist is under a general duty to act with integrity under Section 1 of the Code, and must obviously consider the interests of his or her client under Sections 1 and 5 of the Code. The Code has a specific requirement that psychologists should not improperly benefit from their work with clients (Section 5.2) and also requires the psychologist to recognise the power differential that is likely to exist because of the relationship of trust between the psychologist and the client, and to be careful not to exploit this (Section 5.3).

The committee would also suggest that the psychologist should consider involving a supervisor or disinterested colleague in the decision, because of the difficulty in making objective decisions where one may stand to gain from the outcome. The psychologist should also remember to check his or her contract of employment.

The committee is working on columns covering some of the other suggestions that have been made to us, and would be interested in any other suggestions or feedback that members have on ethical issues. You can contact the committee by e-mailing Christine O’Rourke at chroro@bps.org.uk.
Disciplinary notices

Marion Ruth Anderson

A CONDUCT committee hearing was held between Tuesday 6 September and Thursday 8 September 2005 to hear allegations of professional misconduct against Mrs Marion Ruth Anderson, a Chartered Clinical Psychologist and Associate Fellow of the Society.

Mrs Anderson faced three charges of breaching the British Psychological Society’s Code of Conduct. One charge was dismissed at the start of the proceedings, a second was found unproven and Mrs Anderson admitted a third charge.

The case centred on an assessment provided by Mrs Anderson of a young woman in the care of social services in 2000. The assessment was to ascertain whether the woman, who was living in a hostel, was capable of giving informed consent.

The charge Mrs Anderson admitted was that she had failed to keep accurate and contemporaneous notes or records in respect of her contact with the patient, in breach of Clause 5.1 of the Code of Conduct.

The conduct committee decided that, Mrs Anderson should be given a formal reprimand and required to engage a clinical supervisor who will report to the Society at six-monthly intervals for a period of one year on her note taking and record keeping.

Guillermo Carlos Gorsse

A CONDUCT committee sat on Monday 12 September 2005 to hear allegations of professional misconduct against Mr Guillermo Gorsse, a Graduate Member of the Society.

The committee heard that Mr Gorsse was convicted at Guildford Crown Court on 26 July 2004 of assaulting his partner causing her actual bodily harm on 7 December 2002. He was subsequently jailed for seven months.

During his court case Mr Gorsse referred to his degree in psychology and membership of the Society in mitigation. The committee also found that Mr Gorsse had sought to use his knowledge of psychology to manipulate his victim. Mr Gorsse’s conviction and membership of the Society were reported in the local media.

The conduct committee judged that his conduct had brought into disrepute the discipline and profession of psychology, contrary to Article 12 of the Royal Charter. It was further decided that this conduct had rendered him unfit to continue as a member of the Society, and consequently the committee ruled that he should be expelled from membership of the British Psychological Society.

HISTORY GOES ONLINE

THE Society’s History of Psychology Centre has now gone online (www.bps.org.uk/hopc). When fully developed this will enable online access to the archive, psychological test and library catalogues plus other pages devoted to, for example, birth and death dates of British psychologists and resources related to them, useful references for those teaching history of psychology, links to related sites, a Society chronology, and notices of forthcoming events. It also includes information for potential donors and details of our ongoing Oral History Project (being undertaken in collaboration with the History and Philosophy of Psychology Section). Although it will not be possible in the immediate future we are, additionally, planning to enable online access to the Grace Rawlings Visual Archive and John C. Kenna Audio Archive. We are hoping that some of these pages will be developed interactively with Society members, and of course we welcome feedback on any aspects of the site. We might even get around to producing a guide to Society acronyms past and present! The long-term aim is to create a resource of use to all members, not just historians of psychology, who find themselves needing to track down historical information or bibliographic guidance.
